In the structure of psychosis, castration is foreclosed and lack is neither accepted nor borne. Freud called it Verwerfung, repudiation. The place of lack is lacking and castration returns in the real as happens, for instance, in the case of hallucination. Lacan tried to theorize beyond the bedrock of castration with his ideas on the end of analysis.

Once more, we will explore questions on where sexual desire is located, and representations of female desire through murder and castration. This is part of a women-only series with Claudia Celadon, where we read and discuss psychoanalytic and philosophical texts in order to investigate the depiction of women in visual arts and literature.

Desire, Murder, Castration: women in psychoanalysis ...

In Freudian psychoanalysis, castration anxiety (Kastrationsangst) refers to an unconscious fear of penile loss originating during the phallic stage of psychosexual development and lasting a lifetime. According to Freud, when the infantile male becomes aware of differences between male and female genitalia he assumes that the female's penis has been removed and becomes anxious that his penis will be cut off by his rival, the father figure, as punishment for desiring the mother figure.
