Mind, Self, and Society is a book based on the teaching of American sociologist George Herbert Mead's, published posthumously in 1934 by his students. It is credited as the basis for the theory of symbolic interactionism. Charles W. Morris edition of Mind, Self, and Society initiated controversies about authorship because the book was based on oral discourse and Mead's students notes. George H. Mead shows a psychological analysis through behavior and interaction of an individual's self with real

Mind as the Individual Importation of the Social Process. I have been presenting the self and the mind in terms of a social process, as the importation of the conversation of gestures into the conduct of the individual organism, so that the individual organism takes these organized attitudes of the others called out by its own attitude, in the form of its gestures, and in reacting to that response calls out other organized attitudes in the others in the community to which the individual belongs.

Summary: Mind Self and Society. Posted on August 22, 2011 by Beth M. The Introduction by Charles W. Morris has helped me to succintly place my fingers on what's important to take away from these three essays as well as to understand Mead in context of his social setting. He's hugely influenced by Charles Darwin, and he's greatly indebted to Watson's behaviorism.

George Herbert Mead is widely recognized as one of the most brilliantly original American pragmatists. Although he had a profound influence on the development of social philosophy, he published no books in his lifetime. This makes the lectures collected in Mind, Self, and Society all the more remarkable, as they offer a rare synthesis of his ideas.
