Instead the decline of religion is broad based with many driving factors. One of them is simply that irreligious parents have irreligious children, so that new voters are entering the electorate without ever being religious. Moreover, leaving congregations because of political difference occurs across the partisan spectrum.

Religious participation is declining among Americans even though religion is still very popular. According to the latest Religious Landscape Study by the Pew Research Forum, the percentage of Americans who believe in God, attend religious services and pray daily has declined significantly during the last eight years, especially among adolescents. The drop in religious participation is larger among whites, and less among blacks.
